

HOW AN IRISH FAMILY TOOK JESUS' CONSPIRACY OF HOPE ACROSS THE GLOBE.

Agapé Ireland, is pleased to announce the forthcoming release of "The Electrician's Children" written by David Wilson. Telling the story of three generations of an Irish family and their missionary work across five continents.

Starting in rural County Donegal in the 1920s, "The Electrician's Children" is a memoir that follows the electrician's two sons and daughter as they become champions of the plain-spoken message of Jesus. They recount their adventures throughout Ireland, the UK, and in Russia, East Africa, East Asia, Western Europe, and Pakistan. Along the way, readers will read how their message of faith, hope and mercy is received.

"The Electrician's Children" provides unique first-hand material that spans three generations, it includes an inside view, so far undocumented, of the Plymouth Brethren movement. David and his siblings recount the impact of their allegiance to Christ in the face of inequality, diplomacy, poverty, reconciliation in Northern Ireland, the arts, burnout, and personal tragedy.

The reader will be left at once mesmerised by the extent of their work as well as being inspired by their example. Compelling reading.

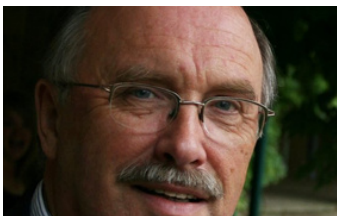

Sr Marie McNamara

This is the story of disarming courage, indescribable generosity and heartrending personal suffering. In burnout and breaking out their dependence on God is life changing. Boredom is non-existent. You will be inspired, encouraged and moved by reading this book. I certainly have!

Rt. Rev. Kenneth Clarke

'There's nothing like the company of people who will discuss the big issues of life together,' writes David Wilson. This book, and the people it depicts, are great company themselves. And, as the writer makes clear, Christ is the best company of all.
